President Obama has made rigor and results a cornerstone of his social policy agenda. He has called for a "new era of responsibility" in government, and he has set ambitious goals for improving the effectiveness of social programs.

Obama's focus on rigor and results is based on the belief that government should be held accountable for the outcomes of its policies. He has argued that we need to move beyond simply throwing money at social problems and start demanding evidence that our programs are actually working.

To this end, Obama has implemented a number of reforms to promote rigor and results in social policy. These reforms include:

- The use of data and evidence to inform decision-making

- The establishment of performance standards
- The promotion of innovation and experimentation

The use of data and evidence to inform decision-making is essential for ensuring that social programs are effective. Obama has directed federal agencies to collect and use data to track the progress of their programs and to identify areas for improvement.

The establishment of performance standards is another important way to promote rigor and results in social policy. Performance standards set clear goals for what social programs should achieve, and they provide a way to measure the progress of these programs.

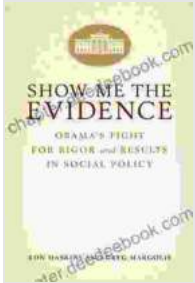

Obama has also promoted innovation and experimentation in social policy. He has created a number of initiatives to support the development and testing of new approaches to social problems.

Obama's focus on rigor and results in social policy has had a number of positive outcomes. For example, the use of data and evidence has helped to identify effective social programs, and the establishment of performance standards has helped to improve the performance of these programs.

Obama's reforms have also helped to promote innovation and experimentation in social policy. This has led to the development of new approaches to social problems, such as the use of technology to deliver social services.

Obama's fight for rigor and results in social policy is a major step forward in the effort to improve the lives of Americans. By demanding evidence that our social programs are working, and by setting clear goals for what these programs should achieve, Obama is helping to ensure that government is held accountable for the outcomes of its policies.
