A Serendipitous Encounter: From Choir Girl to Disney Princess

Leah Wilcox's path to stardom began as a choir girl in her hometown of Los Angeles. Little did she know that her love for singing would lead her to the grand stage of Disney animation. In a fortunate turn of events, Wilcox's vocal coach heard of an open audition for "Waking Beauty" and suggested she try out. With a touch of hesitation, Wilcox auditioned and sang "Once Upon a Dream," instantly impressing the casting directors with her pure and enchanting voice.

The Transformation: Embracing the Essence of Aurora

Donning the iconic white gown and ethereal headpiece, Leah Wilcox transformed herself into the beloved Princess Aurora. She embraced the character's gentle nature, finding inspiration in the works of ballet dancers and classical painters. Wilcox studied Aurora's graceful movements, her expressive eyes, and her unwavering hope for a brighter future. By immersing herself in the character, Wilcox brought Princess Aurora to life with a depth and authenticity that captivated audiences.

A Symphony of Voices: The Making of "Once Upon a Dream"

One of the most unforgettable moments in "Waking Beauty" is the iconic song "Once Upon a Dream."
